IRIB: Voice of the People or Instrument of Repression?

At exactly 6:36 p.m. on Sunday, June 16, 2025, during a routine live broadcast from Iran's state-run television (IRIB), a moment occurred that will likely be remembered as a symbol of resistance:

A loud explosion shook the very building that had, for decades, manufactured silence, distorted reality, and erased the voices of millions.

This was not merely a physical strike—it was deeply psychological, symbolic, and collective.

For countless Iranians inside and outside the country, it felt like a release:
Finally, a sound louder than lies.

Why This Strike Felt Different to Iranians

In most countries, an attack on a media headquarters would be considered a national tragedy. But for Iranians, the Islamic Republic of Iran Broadcasting (IRIB) is not a public media service—it's the mouthpiece of authoritarian control.

For decades, IRIB:

Denied the murder of Mahsa Amini.

Silenced grieving mothers demanding justice.

Aired forced confessions of political prisoners.

Branded peaceful protesters as “foreign agents.”

Celebrated executioners and demonized victims.

It became a weapon of mass disinformation, targeting its own people. So when it burned—at the very moment it was reading a threatening statement—it felt less like an attack and more like a turning point.

85% Voiceless, 15% Amplified

Surveys, social data, and underground reports reveal a painful truth:

At least 85% of Iranians oppose or reject the regime.

Yet this overwhelming majority remains muted, deprived of representation—because they have no media of their own. Meanwhile, a 15% minority, tied to state power, monopolizes all public narratives through IRIB and affiliated propaganda outlets.

That's why, for millions of Iranians, the strike on IRIB was not war—it was symbolism. A message: You may silence us, but not forever.

Netanyahu's Words Echo in Persian Hearts

Amidst this moment, a single sentence from Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu unexpectedly touched the hearts of many Iranians:

Our problem is not with the people of Iran. Our fight is with the oppressive regime."

In a country where state TV has portrayed Israel as a demonic force for decades, this message was profoundly human, respectful—and healing.

For the first time, many Iranians realized the war was not between nations, but between a regime and its people.

To millions, Netanyahu—a controversial figure globally—suddenly became someone who finally heard their cry.

Tears of a Different Kind

That night, Iranians cried. But for once, not out of fear or grief.

They cried from relief, recognition, and the unfamiliar feeling of being seen by the outside world.

Quotes from real Iranians:

"For the first time, I felt someone understood us. They called my brother a martyr and his killer a hero. Tonight, justice tasted real."

"This wasn't revenge—it was revelation."
One Explosion, a Thousand Meanings

This was not the beginning of war.
It wasn't even the end of it.

It was a strike against silence, a blow to the regime's illusion that it could control truth forever.

It reminded the world:

A state is not its people.

Oppression breeds resistance.

And truth will always find a way.

What Do Iranians Want?

But a Life Worth Living—with Dignity and Our Own Voice.
We Wish For

Media that doesn't lie.

Justice that doesn't kill for speaking truth.

A country where mothers aren't afraid of midnight phone calls.

Schools that teach, not indoctrinate.

Women who can walk freely.

A nation where disagreement isn't treason.

A future where Iranians and Israelis—Jews, Muslims, Kurds, Baloch, atheists—celebrate together, not mourn together.

Final Reflection?

June 16, 2025, was not just another day.
It was the day a building of oppression shook,
and the world heard—perhaps for the first time—
the real voice of the Iranian people.

In a world that had grown deaf to our suffering—someone finally listened.

This article is not just analysis.
It is my personal cry of solidarity with my people—
those who were silenced, imprisoned, exiled, or executed simply for seeking truth and freedom.

Under the reckless grip of Ali Khamenei, the Islamic Republic has dragged our country into darkness, madness, and irreversible wounds.

But we still resist.

We still dream.

And we still believe in light beyond this shadow.

A Note from the Author

I am not a journalist.
But I am a witness. A survivor. A voice.
One of many who carry the stories of those no longer able to speak.

If the next generation one day asks:
"When they tried to kill the truth, who kept it alive?"

Let history remember:

The people, Always the people.
